Beet growers plant biotech beets now while judge weighs injunction

By DAVE WILKINS
Capital Press

Sugar beet growers are already planting genetically modified seed even though a federal judge is expected to rule any day on an injunction that could bar further planting and use of the crop.

Some beets have already been planted in the Amalgamated Sugar Co.'s growing area, said Duane Grant, chairman of the Snake River Sugar Co., the growers' cooperative that controls the company. Amalgamated has growers in Idaho, Eastern Oregon and Eastern Washington.

Sugar beets

Grant, who farms near Rupert, Idaho, said beet growers will continue their work "as normal," barring any court ruling that forces them to stop.

He declined to speculate about what will happen if the court does grant an injunction.

U.S. District Judge Jeffrey S. White is expected to rule at any time on a preliminary injunction request filed by the Center for Food Safety. The organization is seeking a ban on the planting of Roundup Ready sugar beet seed.

Grant said he had no idea when the judge would make his ruling. "The judge will make his ruling on his calendar," he said. "We will defer to his timetable."

Growers are expected to plant mostly Roundup Ready beet seed again this year, barring an injunction. About 95 percent of the U.S.
